

WHAT PEOPLE ARE SAYING ABOUT THE “FULL FAITH AND CREDIT ACT”

“The second thing to point out is that Toomey has the right of it; we should prioritize debt payments over other spending . . . our debt payments do not simply go to enrich feckless corporations. They go into things like insurance pools, 401(k)s, and pension funds.” – Megan McArdle, The Atlantic, 02/01/11

“Senator Toomey should be commended, not criticized, for addressing the reality of the difficult choices such an event would require and for proposing to assure our lenders that our debt obligations face no risk.” – Alex Brill, American Enterprise Institute, 01/27/11

“On behalf of more than 1.6 million Americans for Prosperity activists in all 50 states, I commend you for introducing the [Full Faith and Credit Act], which hopefully will end the demagoguery over whether the country is going to default on its debt obligations.” – Americans for Prosperity, 01/25/11

“I urge you to cosponsor Sen. Toomey’s Full Faith and Credit Act. It makes it clear that the debt ceiling and defaulting on our debt need not be related. If the debt limit is reached, we must prioritize payments on the debt held by the public to prevent a default on our debt.” – Matt Kibbe, Freedom Works, 02/02/11

“Toomey-McClintock is a solid first step in what many expect to be a long, hyperbolic fight to rein in spending. As we’ve said before, Congress should use the opportunity presented by the vote to increase the debt ceiling to get transformational changes which will set our country back on the path towards prosperity.” – Heritage Foundation, 02/02/11

“He [Senator Toomey] correctly points out that if the debt limit is reached, the government will still have plenty of money to service the national debt. So don’t believe the hysteria that default will immediately occur. Instead, we should take this opportunity to highlight the waste in government and cut it from the budget.” – Club for Growth, 01/19/11
